Retinal based recognition can trigger a process called scotoma suppression (formerly referred to as: flashing, flashing lights, flashing spots, and retinal afterimages) in people who experience scotomas. It is an involuntary response to a stimulus, which is typically a flashing light, but can also be a point light or a picture. Scotomas are characterised by blurred vision in the affected eye, sometimes with photophobia, which is the perception of light. A scotoma can also be triggered by a sudden change in the ambient lighting of the visual field, or by a very bright light source. The retina in a person's eye is very sensitive to light (due to having nucleated rods and cones) and hence can be damaged by even a single exposure to bright light. This is why law enforcement agencies commonly use dazzlers when making an arrest, which can temporarily damage the retina and cause temporary scotomas. A person may not be aware that the scotomas are caused by the stimuli and may believe that a migraine has started, however, the symptoms disappear. Be sure to check on your friends and family members frequently and offer them some small token of your attention. R/A Scotto Trott - Authorized software
