Feminist activist and university lecturer Caroline Criado-Perez took to Twitter recently to fire off a furious attack against William Shakespeare's late 16th century play Othello. In case you're wondering, it's not the first time that Criado-Perez has caused controversy with her highly politicised opinions. In 2014 she accused Welsh rugby player Gareth Thomas of racism for objecting to black people being used as mascots. He was also smeared by some as a racist who wanted a "white England". As William Shakespeare's play portrays, the black woman - so-called "race traitor" - Othello (although she clearly did not know that at the time) gets murdered in the belief that his crime was sleeping with her husband. It's a brutal portrayal that's also come under attack for being offensive to women. A 20th century play was banned in Northern Ireland for portraying racist attitudes towards Irish Catholics. READ MORE: Othello: here's why I'm so upset with the Shakespeare play (and why I'm upset with Criado-Perez) I'm not sure exactly how my blog came to be chosen as the most likely hate site for the UK's Muslim population on the anti-Islamic organisation Hizb ut-Tahrir's website, but I'm glad that I was. There's no point rehashing the details here. Suffice it to say that Hizb ut-Tahrir is a closed, self-declared, radical, Islamist organisation that believes that "the laws of God" should govern how people live in the modern world. As a female, leftist, feminist, Welsh, bisexual and European, it was the perfect combination of characteristics for the organisation to target me with a "report".
