In a commercial or industrial gas or water distribution system, it is often desirable to measure the flow rate, the composition, or the presence of a constituent, such as carbon dioxide, in the distributed gas. Similarly, in a gas or water distribution system it is desirable to measure the gas or water pressure. In some installations, the temperature of the gas or water can be measured, as well. A variety of devices and methods have been used to achieve these measurements. Unfortunately, such devices and methods are often unreliable. For example, devices that rely on the expansion of a fluid in a capillary tube are often inaccurate for very low fluid flow rates. Other devices depend upon a piezoelectric crystal to generate a signal that is sensitive to the presence of CO₂, H₂O or other constituents. Unfortunately, these devices are sensitive to variations in flow rate and composition. Other devices have been devised that attempt to compensate for these shortcomings. However, they are often complex to use, expensive and, in the case of detectors using a piezoelectric crystal, prohibitively expensive. It is with respect to these considerations and others that the apparatus and method have been made and are described.
