the chemotherapeutic efficacy of Cisplatin in prostate cancer cells. The risk of death from prostate cancer is closely associated with the degree of metastasis. Recent studies have shown that human mesenchymal stromal cells (MSCs) have the potential to inhibit the growth and metastasis of prostate cancer. However, few studies have focused on the interaction between MSCs and traditional anticancer agents. Using co-culture systems, we investigated the relationship between MSC-derived microparticles (MPs) and the growth inhibitory effect of cisplatin on prostate cancer cells. Prostate cancer PC3 cells were co-cultured with human bone marrow-derived MSCs and the effect of MSC-derived MPs on the cell viability of prostate cancer cells was examined after cisplatin treatment. The levels of MP-associated proteins (VEGF, T
