Steinbruner, in response to my question about whether “skeptical” about climate change means “hopeful” or “pessimistic” (or “something else”), observes that “skepticism has many manifestations, just as belief has as well.” He lists several. There’s the “peer-reviewed science skepticism,” in which a scientist writes an opinion piece in a major science journal, like The New York Times, challenging the accepted consensus on the subject, and the paper is then subjected to peer-review, in which scientists who don’t share the scientific opinion are brought in to put the paper through its paces. But there's another kind of skepticism, he writes: "Skepticism of science" is sometimes heard when people refuse to believe a scientific fact or to accept scientific findings. Thus, there are those who, though recognizing that Ozone depletion is real, refuse to believe that this atmospheric pollutant is responsible for the decline in the levels of the stratospheric ozone layer. There is a sense in which they may be correct in that a scientific hypothesis can be tested, and we know that CFC's are now unnecessary for replenishing the ozone layer. If you're skeptical that climate change is real, Steinbruner suggests, you may be like those who believe that CFC's are not polluting the ozone layer — they should have tried to measure the CFC's or should have had a measurement system in place when the phenomenon was observed. We don't know if atmospheric CO2 is increasing, we don't
