External links Category:Bug and issue tracking software Category:Free software programmed in DelphiToday, most common security systems use a two-way radio to alert a building's occupants to an alarm condition, or to allow an authorized attendant access to a building. The radio in such a system is typically provided as a handheld portable device that can be moved freely around a building by the user. If a radio is lost or stolen, the user is able to simply replace the radio and attempt to use the radio to alert the building's occupants to an alarm condition. If the radio is located within the building and enabled for remote operation, an authorized attendant may simply enter the building and turn the radio on. If, however, the radio has been left outside the building, the user must either exit the building or risk discovery by the person carrying out the burglary. To address this problem, the security industry has developed a number of different devices which remotely lock the radio, thus preventing the radio from being turned on. In these prior devices, the radio is either secured to a wall or to a doorframe or the like. When the radio is mounted in this manner, it is often quite difficult for a user to turn on the radio. However, when the radio is not secured, there is a risk that the radio will be taken and used by an unauthorized individual. Accordingly, there is a need in the art for a security system that does not require a radio to be mounted and that allows a radio to be readily accessed by an authorized user.
