In patient or "in vivo" studies, researchers need to measure the microparticles, which are small enough to pass through the body's blood vessels, but which are larger than normal. In test tube studies, researchers can isolate microparticles by passing a sample through a centrifuge machine that separates molecules and cells based on size. In the past researchers had to target the particular cells they wanted to study based on the antibodies they carried. Now, however, researchers can use a system that allows them to target a large number of cells through one lab-produced reagent. This system, the researchers say, is a boon to immunologists and researchers studying other fields, as well. "This system allows one to analyze different properties or 'biomarkers' by simply changing the peptide sequence on the antibody. This is an advantage because the antibody is a key component of the system. For example, you can do studies with one type of cells that express a certain antigen, but in different pathological states," team member Chi-Wei Chang, Ph.D., assistant professor of surgery, said in a news release. "I believe this is a big step forward and will open up multiple fields of research." The research team says the system can be used for studies of diseases of the brain and spinal cord, cancer, and other conditions.
