
Driver Philips Picopix 2230

the picopix pip2455-21-g10s is a perfectly acceptable choice to get you going with the picopix pip series. the software that is installed is for the pip series only. just select the pip2455-21-g10s from the list of available projects when you run the install program. on selecting the project you will get a prompt that tells you this is not a licensed pip series. you will then be asked for your serial number which is not in the box. this has to be done using the usb cable that came with the projector. the source component on the picopix pip2455-21-g10s is a component video cable with a picture connector, a composite video connector and a component video power connector. here is the check for the installation. philips says the ppx2055 have a green light-emitting diode (led) and a blue led on the lamp casing. the blue led flash to create a single white point colour, which then carries out to the full resolution of your screen. and if you want to share something from your display with others, you can plug in the output hdmi cable which will make the pc display appear on your tv or home cinema. according to philips, the ppx2055 is an etl approved hdmi connector. the output hdmi cable is purely for switching the projector on and off. the hdmi output cable is built-in by design and will not be of use to users of the netpics extension kit. dynamically scalable, the picopix pocket can be programmed to automatically expand to fit various sized rooms, let you switch to other screen sizes, and save you from having to go through the trouble of rooting your smartphone. this is accomplished with a couple of simple operations on the projector itself.

unfortunately, the picopix ppx2055 is a long way from actually being ready to be used. for a start, it's really, really tiny, so it's hard to make sure you've got everything plugged in properly. also, although the lens does incorporate a large hot shoe, it is so small that the only way to mount a printable is to secure it to a piece of rigid material before it even comes close to the lens. the picopix ppx2055 is also really loud; levels of 60 decibels average out around 50dba in use, which is a lot louder than many other projectors. it's also incredibly cheap, at around 20 on ebay, which is a hard sell even when it's a projector you can mount in a similar way to a smartphone. and while the software we tested successfully sent video from this tiny projector, any hardware issues are likely to bring a picopix down. the small resolution of the picopix ppx2055 means that you'll have to scale up the video being projected if you want to make it fit on a television. while this isn't exactly tricky, it's time consuming and can be expensive to have a video created in a different resolution, and it's relatively easy to make mistakes if you scale the wrong way. furthermore, you'll still have to deal with the fact that a large image won't fit neatly on a screen, and that it often lacks contrast, unlike a device like the benq w10 that we tested last year. another major issue, that doesn't just affect the picopix ppx2055, is that if you do fit the picopix ppx2055 on a screen, you can't get the most from it.

while it uses the same resolution as most video editing software, which outputs video at 1080i, you'll still be limited to 720p on the picopix. a shame, really; you'd think it would be as easy to make videos for projection as for editing. 5ec8ef588b
