Several methods of treatment can be used for wound infection, including the use of hyperbaric oxygen, negative pressure drainage, silver-impregnated topical dressing, intensive debridement and irrigation, subcutaneous antibiotics, and surgical debridement with antibiotic irrigation. None of these have been found to be uniformly successful, and the addition of hyperbaric oxygen can be very expensive. Topical (intra-dermal, subcutaneous, and intramuscular) and systemic therapy has had variable success in patients with chronic osteomyelitis secondary to ankle fractures. [ref9] The efficacy of silver impregnated autograft material has been evaluated using animal models. [ref10] Placing percutaneous silver suction drains has also been shown to be effective, but the effectiveness of silver impregnated dressings and vascularized muscle flap coverage has been questioned. [ref8] [ref11] Osteomyelitis of the proximal fibula has been described as a very difficult problem with poor functional results.
