Women are better at giving up on projects than men, finds a new study. The researchers studied 1,082 university students from the USA. Although men and women have equal ideas of what constitutes success, they differ in their willingness to give up on unsuccessful tasks. Most of us hesitate to give up on things. It is practically an automatic response. If you are on the subway and it has become unusually crowded, you are not likely to offer your seat to a stranger. And you certainly are not going to pause to ask if there is an empty seat for you. In the same way, we seem to have little trouble giving up on tasks that are not successful. But there's one difference between men and women when it comes to giving up on unsuccessful tasks. After spending a few minutes working on a task and thinking it was going to be successful, women say they are less likely to give it up than men. In the study, published in the journal Psychological Science, the researchers asked the students how they felt about their previous tasks. Next, the students thought about what they would do if the task was unsuccessful - whether they would change their work or leave it as it was. In general, men gave up more than women when their task was unsuccessful. When it was successful, women and men gave up at the same rate. When giving up on a task is not an option, men and women give up at about the same rate. But when it comes to giving up, women are more optimistic about the task in their memory of what happened, said the researcher, Anne Marie Chang of the University of Wisconsin-Madison. It is also important to remember that we tend to give up on more menial tasks. "The kind of goal we are talking about is more likely to be given up on by women in their more efficient choice of what it is they will work on." Chang said, "So, we may not be talking about women being less efficient at working on tasks, but giving up on tasks in general." "I
