Adobe Photoshop comes at an extremely high price and that could be a dealbreaker for a lot of remote workers. However, Adobe also offers a free tier version — Photoshop CC 2019 — for people who like to code, design, and build stuff from the web. Adobe released three new Photoshop features for professionals working on the Web.

These three new Photoshop features—Web Spin, Web Filters, and Web View—are designed to take full advantage of the internet. They all share a similar workflow: pull, import, enhance, allow for adjustment. These new tools make it easier to place slices of an image in another part of the internet and tweak the placement with virtual previews. Adobe also upgraded the browser compatibility of these tools, which should make it easier to interact with them remotely. These new tools give web designers, coders and developers a little bit more power to execute on powerful web design concepts. The Web Filters feature—which you can access in the Develop menu—allows you to perform compositing operations on images, place them in different parts of the web, and manipulate them independently or together. The Web View feature—which you can access in the pre-public beta section of the interface—combines Web Filters and the Web Browser into an all-in-one. You can import images, place them anywhere in your web page, and add animations to them. That all sounds pretty awesome: you can place an image in a Google Maps segment, change the text color of that sentence in a section of a news article, or change the font color of that paragraph.
