A disc brake includes a brake lever. When the brake lever is pulled by a driver's hand, a latch mechanism latches the brake lever, thereby locking a brake pad, a rotor and a vehicle wheel. When the brake lever is pushed by the driver's hand, the latch mechanism unlatches the brake lever, thereby releasing the brake pad, the rotor and the vehicle wheel. Since the brake pad, the rotor and the vehicle wheel are prevented from being moved in a rotating direction of the vehicle wheel by the latch mechanism, the brake pad, the rotor and the vehicle wheel are caused to be brought into a frictional state with each other by the operation of the latch mechanism to generate a braking force. Therefore, the brake pad is pressed against the rotor, and the rotor is pressed against the vehicle wheel. In a general brake lever, a free end of the brake lever is pivotally supported in a boss. The boss is supported by a pivotal support member to which one end of a first cable is fixed. The pivotable support member is supported by a pivotal support member to which one end of a second cable is fixed. The first cable and the second cable are linked to each other so that their extension is contracted and their retraction is expanded. If the brake lever is not inserted into a pair of brake levers, a rotation shaft of the brake lever is locked by the latch mechanism. In this case, since the brake lever cannot pivot, the brake pad cannot be positioned at the rotor, and a vehicle wheel cannot be locked. Therefore, the driver's hand must be pulled to a considerable extent, and this is an inconvenience to the driver. In order to prevent the inconvenience, there is known a brake lever of a disc brake which includes a groove in a rear end portion. The groove has a depth to extend to a whole circumference on the rear end portion of
