Peroxidase cytochemistry demonstrates a specifically concentrated and active lactotroph population in human normal pituitaries. The lactotrophs extend from the peripheral anterior lobe into the intermediate lobe, forming a continuity with the corticotroph cells. The lactotrophs are of two types: 1) small, densely packed cells, usually obscured by corticotrophs, and 2) large, lightly packed, and evenly spaced cells, most of which are separated from surrounding corticotrophs by small gaps in which peroxidase-positive material accumulates in an irregular fashion. Granules are occasionally seen in all cell types. No cell shows specific immunoreactivity for alpha-lactalbumin, beta-lactoglobulin, glycoprotein, and insulin-like growth factor II. This finding suggests that the lactotrophs synthesize and release only prolactin rather than all three major lactogenic hormones and that the synthesis of alpha-lactalbumin, beta-lactoglobulin, and glycoprotein by lactotrophs is minimal.
