Pharmacists most often work in the hospital setting, primarily in inpatient settings. Although the value of outpatient pharmacists in the ambulatory setting has been generally recognized for at least 25 years, the bulk of pharmacists' time in the ambulatory setting still is spent in dispensing, monitoring drug therapy, and other administrative activities. The purpose of this article is to describe the scope of activities of pharmacists who worked in the ambulatory setting in a large health care system and to review the results of a systematic comparison of such pharmacists' medication counseling activities with national standards for pharmacists in the ambulatory setting. A pharmacists' prescription review system was developed and implemented by the health system. Medication counseling activities were reviewed for 105 pharmacists who were in practice for at least 6 months. The frequency and type of counseling activities were evaluated by manual review of all prescribing, dispensing, monitoring, and educational activities, while the activity rates were assessed by automated methods. Of the 105 pharmacists, 24%, 48%, and 28% worked solely in a pharmacy, in a medical clinic, and in a hospital, respectively. A mean of 21,778 distinct patient visits per year were attended by the pharmacists during their nonclinical hours. The pharmacists were responsible for counseling 726 patients on 769 unique medications during their observations. Of the 584 (55%) patients whose medications were changed, 431 (73%) received a modification in therapy. The review of a random sample of 45 pharmacists' prescriptions showed that activities that met standards for pharmacists included 33 (73%) medications that were recommended for each of four current and four prospective indications. Of 31 pharmacists (63%) who provided counseling on nine or more current medications, 23 (74%) provided adequate counseling on each. (A statistically significant relationship was observed between the number of current medications prescribed and the number of medications on which counseling was provided. The pharmacists who saw 9 or more current prescriptions gave adequate counseling on 9.3 medications and saw 10 or more current prescriptions give adequate counseling on 13.8 medications.) No significant relationship was observed between number of current prescriptions and the number of medications on which counseling was provided or between the number of current prescriptions and the rate of "usually" counseling or "almost always"
